The vote capped a morning and early afternoon fraught with legislative maneuvering and some amount of nail-biting, as Hagel's controversial attempt to substitute the language of the McCain-Feingold bill was split into three sections, each of which the stewards of McCain-Feingold sought to table with a vote.

One of those sections survived when an overwhelming number of senators from both parties voted first not to table and then to approve a Hagel provision that would set in place stricter disclosure requirements for the sources of campaign contributions.
